It's never too early to think about the future. A future that includes a job and a career. According to US research "the number one indicator of a successful labour market attachment for young people with disabilities, upon graduation from school, is having had a paid job while in high school".

Today, many businesses are becoming more aware and are much more interested in including people who have an intellectual disability in the workforce.

This session will illustrate highlights and success stories but, more importantly, speak to what families can do to plan and prepare for a future that includes employment for their loved ones.
